

SIOBHAN: Female, Mid 30's, Irish.

A photographer, intuitive, creative, a dreamer but with a practical side.

When her ten year relationship broke down she took a sabbatical from her job as a university lecturer to take up an fellowship with a Chicago photographer. She also works part-time in a cafe and volunteers in a community college. She sublets a small photographic studio which also doubles as her home. She met Marian in the ER when she got bitten by a tic. They hit it off and she offered to take photos of Marian's daughter's First Holy Communion That's where she met Joelle. They joke that they met at Church. Joelle took one of her photography courses at the community college and the rest is history as they say! Had a few casual relationships after her break up but is more interested in a stable committed relationship if she can find the right person and allow herself to trust again. Brought up a Catholic but is no longer a Church-goer. Irish Accent.

SIOBHAN:

I haven't slept in weeks. I keep thinking to myself that something isn't right. I just started to question if you really love me. I'm going to take this leap—and I may be wrong for saying this—but I get this growing sense that you don't love me as much as I love you. Love is not emoji, Joelle. Do you know how long I've waited for you to show up? To get your full attention. I told myself each time I lied down with you or by myself, saying maybe by morning, you will meet me where I am. It's really quite hilarious how you can chase someone without making a single step. Not for you to love me but for you to be present. I chose you. I chose you, Joelle. We're not playing Russian roulette. I'm not saying this so I can walk away but so we can walk together. That's how this shit works. It's hard fucking work and it takes two people to do it.
